

Survey of Cooperative Extension Educators in the Midwest: On Serving Latino Populations

Rubén Martínez, Jean Kayitsinga, Daniel Vélez Ortiz, Pilar Horner

Research Report No. 55

June 2016

ABSTRACT

A survey of Cooperative Extension educators in the Midwest conducted in the summer of 2015 yielded 724 completed questionnaires. Results show that the majority of respondents have little contact with Latinos but they are interested in learning more about these communities and recognize that more could be done by local Extension units to provide services to them. This includes training for educators so they can better serve Latinos and believe they contribute to their communities. Further a majority believe that more resources should be allocated by Extension units to better serve Latino communities, including hiring more bilingual, bicultural educators.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Rubén Martínez is professor of sociology and director of the Julian Samora Research Institute at Michigan State University. Jean Kayitsinga is an assistant professor at the Julian Samora Research Institute at Michigan State University. Daniel Vélez Ortiz is associate professor of social work with a joint appointment at the Julian Samora Research Institute at Michigan State University. Pilar S. Horner is associate professor of social work with a joint appointment at the Julian Samora Research Institute at Michigan State University.